Beekeeping Ordinance

To view the entire staff report and a list of key elements click on the following link:
<http://www.slcgov.com/council/agendas/2009agendas/Nov10/111009A2.pdf>

The following proposed revisions will be made to the initial draft ordinance.

1. The Council will not specify the number of boxes for each hive.
2. Hives will be allowed in side yards as well as rear yards.
3. The distance regulation requiring a flyway barrier will be changed from 25 feet to 15 feet from an area which provides public access.
4. The Council will maintain the current flyway barrier rule along the property line, however, an “or” clause will be added, allowing for a barrier directly around the hive which would direct the flight path upward or into the beekeeper’s own property.
5. The Council will specify that the 6 inches above ground requirement for placement of the hive will be measured from the ground to the lowest part of the hive.

Chicken Ordinance

To view the entire staff report and a list of key elements click on the following link:
<http://www.slcgov.com/council/agendas/2009agendas/Nov10/111009A3.pdf>

The following proposed revisions will be made to the initial draft ordinance:

1. Property owners will be allowed to keep a coop next to their house.
2. If an owner meets the current ordinance requirement of the coop being placed 50’ from their own house and 50’ from the neighbor’s house, they may keep up to 25 chickens.
3. If an owner meets the proposed ordinance’s distance requirement of 25’ from the neighbor’s house, the owner may keep up to 12 chickens.

4. Since the Salt Lake County Health Departments regulation relating to chickens does not permit slaughtering of chickens, the City Ordinance cannot allow slaughtering.

Salt Lake City agrees to donate unclaimed bicycles

Derek Jensen

The Salt Lake Tribune

Updated: 11/18/2009 02:00:31 PM MST

http://www.sltrib.com/ci_13811325?IADID=Search-www.sltrib.com-www.sltrib.com

Putting butts on bikes just got a boost.

By unanimous vote, the Salt Lake City Council has agreed to allow the police to donate all unclaimed bicycles to the city's nonprofit bicycle collective, which fixes them up for low-income residents and refugees -- often for free.

"It's a great way to get those bicycles back into the community where either kids or low-income families have access to efficient and inexpensive transportation," says Dave Iltis, chairman of the city's Bicycle Advisory Committee. "Given the popularity of cycling, especially as gas prices go up, that total pool -- through abandoned or stolen bicycles -- could go way up."

Parties from the mayor's office and the collective have been working through the details of the resolution for nearly a year. Earlier this month, the council gave its nod. Members say the prospect of putting bikes back on the streets -- even if it means losing a few thousand dollars at public auctions -- benefits the city by providing alternate transportation and reducing air pollution.

"It's more of a value-added partnership than it is a donation," says collective Executive Director Jonathan Morrison, explaining that 30 nonprofits received rehabbed bikes in 2008 -- some as many as 150. The majority, Morrison notes, went to the International Rescue Committee, which helps to service refugees.

Police typically hold bicycles that are stolen, abandoned or kept for case evidence for 90 days. If the owner cannot be contacted, the new program allows them to be declared surplus and then donated.

On average, cops collect 150 to 175 bikes per year. The resolution places an annual cap of 400 that can be donated.

Several nights a week, volunteers meet to repair the bikes at the collective, 2312 S. West Temple. Residents either can buy them for below-market value, work off the cost in a volunteer-trade, or get them for free if they provide signed paperwork showing they are affiliated with a goodwill organization.

"We do sell some bikes to keep the lights on," Morrison says. "But predominantly, most of our bikes are given away."

He praised the city for increasing his inventory, which should guarantee the collective doesn't run out of the two-wheeled treasures. Just in case, Morrison says, the nonprofit is exploring similar resolutions with other cities and their police departments across the Wasatch Front.

Itis says such donations aid Mayor Ralph Becker's goal of enhancing a sustainable community. And he argues the merit of giving them up for reuse outweighs the meager loss of revenue.

"The benefits," he says, both tangible and intangible, are much more than that."

Salt Lake City puts recycling bins along Jordan River

Now residents have no excuse to junk the Jordan River.

Flexing his environmental muscle Wednesday, Salt Lake City Mayor Ralph Becker oversaw the installation of multiple recycling bins along stretches of the Jordan River in an effort to keep the waterway clean.

At the same time, the city has launched a new Web site, www.slccgreen.com, as a hub for sustainability resources. The site includes information on composting, idle-free driving and a carbon calculator.

"Our community is supportive of recycling and sustainability to protect our important natural resources," Becker said. "The city is focused on helping residents and businesses employ leading practices that collectively make a difference to our environment."

The recycling effort reflects a partnership between the city's Division of Sustainability and the University of Utah Lowell Bennion Community Service Center's Bend-in-the-River project.

The Web page offers quarterly tips about how to lead a more sustainable lifestyle. And business owners can access the updated e2 resource center, which highlights environmentally responsible Utah businesses and best practices for management. S.L. County to take control of Sorenson center

By Aaron Falk

Deseret News

Published: Tuesday, Nov. 17, 2009 8:46 p.m. MST

<http://www.deseretnews.com/article/705345289/SL-County-to-take-control-of-Sorenson-center.html>

A beloved west-side community center is now in the hands of Salt Lake County.

Citing budget concerns and impending cutbacks, the Salt Lake City Council agreed to transfer control of the Sorenson Multicultural Center beginning Jan. 1.

"This is a difficult and challenging decision," City Council Chairman Carlton Christensen said prior to Tuesday's 6-1 vote. "I would be reluctant to go down that road if I didn't feel, within my own community, that a similar quality of product and programs" has been provided by Salt Lake County.

The transfer knocks about $260,000 off the city's current $1.1 million annual contribution to the center. Without the deal, city officials estimated they would have to cover an additional $400,000 each year to take control of the Steiner West swimming pool.

Councilman Luke Garrott, the lone holdout, said the transfer made sense from an administrative standpoint but could hurt the community.

"It might cost us more money," Garrott said. "But I think the city should be in the business of running quality after-school programs that are different."

As part of the transfer agreement, city and county officials will contribute to a scholarship program to help offset the differences in fees.

The agreement also calls for county officials to continue operating the center at its current hours and with its current programs — unless a change is approved by a board of residents.

West-side residents have expressed concerns about the power swap, arguing the transfer would saddle families with higher fees and lesser services.

"You've told the children of the Glendale community that they're not worth squat," Glendale resident Jose Garcia told the council following the vote.

S.L. Council removes hurdle for neighborhood bars

Salt Lake City bars just got a new mixer.

The City Council on Tuesday unanimously approved a request from a Marmalade tavern owner to allow watering holes — on a case-by-case basis — to serve hard liquor in the two mixed-use zones in the city's northwest corner.

"This property has been a bar," Councilman Luke Garrott said of Jam, 751 N. 300 West. "This will not degrade the neighborhood. ... This area was rezoned with the idea that this sort of business would be provided."

Councilman Eric Jergensen said he was still concerned about negative impacts bars might have on the single-family homes in those zones but said he believed the conditions a bar owner must meet before being approved by the Planning Commission would mitigate parking, noise and garbage concerns.

Becker signs gay rights ordinances backed by Mormon Church

By Aaron Falk

Deseret News

Published: Tuesday, Nov. 17, 2009 8:42 p.m. MST

<http://www.deseretnews.com/article/705345223/Becker-signs-gay-rights-ordinances-backed-by-Mormon-church.html>

Salt Lake City Mayor Ralph Becker signed a pair of nondiscrimination ordinances, the first of their kind in Utah, to the sound of cameras clicking and applause Tuesday afternoon in the downtown library.

"This is a great moment ... in the history of Salt Lake City," Becker told the dozens of people who had gathered to witness the "historic" event. "Part of our success as a community is all of us living together and respecting each other."

The ordinances, which go into effect after the end of the 2010 legislative session, make it illegal for landlords and employers to discriminate based on sexual orientation — a classification not protected under state or federal laws.

Discrimination complaints could result in fines of up to $1,000 under the law.

Businesses with fewer than 15 employees and landlords with three or fewer properties, however, would be exempt.

The ordinances also carry exemptions for religious institutions, which helped land support from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"The church supports this ordinance because it is fair and reasonable and does not do violence to the institution of marriage," spokesman Michael Otterson told the Salt Lake City Council last week. "In drafting this ordinance, the city has granted common-sense rights that should be available to everyone, while safeguarding the crucial rights of religious organizations — for example, in their hiring of people whose lives are in harmony with their tenets, or when providing housing for their university students and others that preserve religious requirements."

Some groups, including the conservative Sutherland Institute, have said they believe the ordinances could eventually be used in a challenge of the state's same-sex marriage ban.

City officials and advocates for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender residents, meanwhile, lauded Tuesday's signing.

"These ordinances are principally about human dignity and human rights," said Jon Jepsen, a business owner who serves on the city's Human Rights Commission.

Brandie Balken, executive director of Equality Utah, said education about gay-rights issues had helped shift attitudes around the capital city.

"In many ways," Balken said, "we owe this victory ... to the residents of the city for the conversations they're having with their families."

Sustainability Tips

University of Utah Sustainability Open House

Thursday, December 3
5:30-7:00PM
Crimson View Room of the Olpin Union Building (4th Floor).

In an effort to garner vital and necessary input and initiate participation from the neighboring community, the Office of Sustainability will be hosting a community open house on the Climate Action Plan on:

In April 2008, President Michael Young signed the American College and University President's Climate Commitment. In doing so, President Young committed the University of Utah to reaching climate neutrality. In accordance with the commitment, the Office of Sustainability (OS) has been tasked with generating a greenhouse gas inventory and creating a long-term Climate Action Plan. Energy efficiency and transportation solutions are two major topics, along with renewables, curriculum and research, and water, waste, and food.

As we begin the process of creating a Climate Action Plan, we look forward to receiving input from the surrounding community, and are excited to hear your ideas on how the University of Utah can become more sustainable. All community members are encouraged to attend the forum to ask questions, receive information, provide ideas and input, and get involved.

If you have any questions, email info@sustainability.utah.edu or contact Jen Colby in the Office of Sustainability at 801-585-9352.

How to Winterize your Trees

Salt Lake City's urban forest is part of what makes our City so great. Something people may not know, however, is that residents are responsible for keeping park strip trees in good health. Salt Lake City code 2.26.190 states:

Any owner of private property, abutting city parking/planting strips upon which street trees are located, shall have the following responsibilities:

- A. Periodic watering and fertilization of street trees when necessary to maintain good health and vigor;
- B. Protection of street trees against damage caused by lawn mowers, weed trimmers, snow blowers and similar equipment. (Ord. 75-88 1, 1988)

It doesn't take a huge amount of work to maintain our much appreciated neighborhood trees. In fact, right now is a great time to ensure that our trees are taken care of and ready for the winter. Except in severe and prolonged winter conditions, trees remain active and interactive with their surroundings. Trees in urban settings experience real hardship because they have very few of the safeguards a natural forestland provides.

Please remember that to help your tree through winter think, water, air, insulate and care.

- Minimize winter dehydration by aerating the root zone of your tree in autumn and providing low volumes of water during periods of no or minimal precipitation. One application per month during a mild winter should suffice.
- A four-inch layer of mulch is also highly recommended. It will insulate the soil, conserve moisture and protect roots from cold injury. Remember to keep mulch away from the trunk.
- Proper pruning to remove dead, dying, or damaged branches is always a good treatment. Thinning the ends of bowing laterals or removing low branches may also be a good winter precaution. Where the tree is very large, please contact the Salt Lake Urban Forester at 801-972-7818 for more information.
- Use de-icing salts with care and as far from trees as possible.

Wondering what to do with the rest of your leaves?

Don't send them to the landfill!

Dried leaves contain nutrients that are beneficial for your yard!

Compost

- Fall is a perfect time to start composting. Leaves – mixed with grass from your last mow are ideal. Mix them into your existing compost bin or pile, or spread a six-inch layer of leaves throughout your gardens.

Donate

- Contact your local community garden or ask a neighbor with a large garden if they want your extra leaves.

City Collection

- Put leaves (unbagged, of course) in your city-issued yard waste container. We'd actually prefer to pick them up this way because it's more efficient. The last week of collection through the Yard Waste Program will be November 30 – December 4.

- Don't have a yard waste container? Sign up now. We'll deliver a container before you start to clean up your yard in the spring, and we won't charge you for the service until pickup begins next season. To sign up on line: <https://dotnet.slcgov.com/publicutilities/billpayment/> (You'll need your city water account number.)
- Bag your leaves and place them at the curb. To see the leaf collection schedule: <http://www.slcgov.com/publicservices/streets/leaf.htm>
